

Resilience is the ability to “bounce back” from stressful or challenging experiences. It involves being able to adapt to changes and approach negative events, sources of stress and traumatic events as constructively as possible. Being resilient doesn’t mean that a person doesn’t experience difficult life events, but rather that they are better able to cope with them when they do occur.

Often resilience is built through the experience of difficult life events. It is not necessarily a fixed trait, but something all people have the potential to develop.

Developing a greater level of resilience won’t stop negative or stressful things from occurring, however it can reduce the level of disruption a stressor has on the individual and the time it takes for them to recover from it.

Key characteristics of resilience

Resilient individuals:

- Have positive self-belief
- Have a high level of emotional intelligence
- Are aware of situations, their own reactions and the behaviour of others
- Understand and accept that life is full of challenges
- Believe that they have control over the outcome of their lives
- Identify as survivors, rather than victims
- Exhibit strong problem-solving skills
- Are good communicators
- Develop strong social supports
- Are able to ask for help

Resilience and Mental Health

Building our resilience can buffer us from developing mental illnesses such as depression, anxiety or post-traumatic stress disorder. It does so by helping offset certain risk factors that increase the likelihood of experiencing a mental illness.

Risk factors include lack of social support, being bullied, experiencing trauma, socioeconomic disadvantage and social or cultural discrimination. By building your resilience, you can protect your mental health and wellbeing from negative stressors like those above.

For people who already live with mental illness, resilience can help with the experience of setbacks and challenges, while promoting the development of confidence for the effective management of illness and for recovery. With resilience these developments are possible despite the limitations imposed by a mental health condition.

My Club & Resilience

Resilience is something we can all develop by drawing on individual strengths and abilities as well as the connections and support from others around us.

The sense of cohesion derived from belonging to a club or community can build a great sense of motivation within us. A strong club/community can benefit each member of its community in times of stress.

Club/Community resilience is built by strengthening social networks, offering support to members of the community in times of need, working together on common goals as well as ensuring safety and promoting healthy lifestyles. By building a supportive community individual

Shaping, Changing & Saving Lives

Helplines
Network NI

COMMUNITY